

MY IB STORY

IB was the entire last two years of my life. IB was my community of friends, peers, and teachers. IB was both my formal education and my motivator to improve myself as a person. Because of this, IB has taught me what it means to be a serving member of a larger community, what the derivative of X is, and that I don't know half the things I think I do. That is something I've loved about IB. Learning how to learn, how to think, how to articulate what you are thinking are all unique to the IB experience. As in the rest of the world, everything in IB is connected: from students to teachers to curriculum and everything in between. Nothing and no one lives in isolation and I think that's really special. When I helped Mr. Baron in the past by speaking to interested DP students I always said, "IB isn't for everyone, but I know that it's for me."
